Not every database stores the full text of an article. Sometimes a database only stores the citation and abstract. This is useful for you to find out if the article is something you want, but not so useful if you decide that yes, you do want it.

But don't worry! CSM libraries has a tool that searches all of our other online databases and resources and connects you to the full article if we have it somewhere else. Look for a link in your results list. In ProQuest databases it looks like this:

Untangling Self-Blame and Mother-Blame in Women’s and Children’s Perspectives on Maternal Protectiveness in Domestic Violence: Implications for Practice

Moulding, Nicole T; Buchanan, Fiona; Wendt, Sarah. Child Abuse Review; Hoboken 24.4

...‘failure to protect’ their children in domestic violence. Individuals who ...

...on women’s experiences of mothering or children’s experiences of growing up in ...

...children further in violence. Practitioners can encourage communication

Cited by (2) References (32)

Abstract/Details

[Find a copy]Access full text

Clicking on either "Find a copy" or "Access full text" will take you to E-journal Portal, our internal list of all the periodicals (journals, newspapers, and magazines) we have access to, in whatever form, electronic or physical, that we have it. In this case, we can see that we have access to this article in several other databases.

Just click the database link. Sometimes you'll be taken directly to that database's entry for the article, with the attached full text. The article will appear to the left of the above box.